Zachariah he is called..... more on the dog. (review in Issue 103) I think he “gets it” in terms of not being destructive (at least most of the time). My time away at work has increased to 4 hours at a stretch... yippie. I am comfortable, after I walk him, to run to the store and buy food, and do a couple of errands before becoming worried that I will come home to a mess.

I credit my other crazy rescue, generic 50 lb black, brown and white dog about 5 years old) aforementioned Zippie for Zach’s remarkable improvement. He is comfortable with her nurturing, constant nose butting, licking his ears lifting his feet and legs with her nose... I guess it serves a purpose for them both, giving him comfort and attention, providing her with an outlet for all those unused nest building neurons, which sometimes got in the way of keeping her happy. They are the quintessential “odd couple”

It is a strenuous task, that of helping a lost soul become acclimated to a new place to call home. Very strenuous, and requires much “self denial”.... ha ha.

I am hoping that it will be worth the effort in the long run, since at this point we are still getting to know habits and things to keep out of reach (this is not a small dog – not as big as the great danes my daughter has owned, who were masters at opening refrigerators, garbage cans, finding food in cabinets and on counters, but big enough I found out with a disappearing half stick of butter, that nothing can stay on the counter.... ha ha). Thanks to my sister (owner of “the best whisper is a click” (visit her site <http://thebestwhisperisaclick.com>) whose insight into horse training provided great help in getting the basic training done.

Zach can do the following on command: sit stay lie down wait walk (though he still tugs on the leash and we have to make him sit and then begin walking again) and he does his business outside (yippie) reliably, and in expectation of my attentive eye.

For the science.... I looked up on the internet, and he has the agouti gene for coat color (often called “blue” and yellow eyes... so he is a strange looking weimaraner).
