I am so struck in recent years by the impact of the microbiome on human existence... think of the olfactory cues lost to development of landscaping of grass and mulch...(a practice I think distasteful in newly found knowledge of what really constitutes my immediate surroundings, and related to new scientific evidence that we are so much more than “us” but are really 90% something else (mainly our human microbiome).

As I ran a couple miles this morning...only when I passed by the woodsie uncultivated natural areas did I get that magnificent aroma of “outdoors” musk and floral scent, so like a fine perfume. Passing by the manicured expanses of grass and mulch... there was none, nothing, no aroma of “life” and “living” This is likely a product of extensive monoculturing, excessive pesticide and herbicide use, killing off the diversity that produces the olfactory cues that tell us “life is beautiful” - shame on us.
